EMPATHY MAP

Persona: The Everyday Indian News Reader | Based on UI/UX research of The Hindu, Indian Express & Hindustan Times

SAYS

- “I just want to find today's top stories without wading through ads.”
- “Why do I need so many clicks to reach one section?”
- “This site feels cluttered, but I still trust the brand.”
- “I wish the pictures and stories would just load properly.”

THINKS

- Wonders whether paying for a subscription is really worth it.
- Assumes most Indian news sites are equally ad-heavy, so tolerates it.
- Believes local/city-specific news should be easier to surface.
- Worries about missing something important under all the clutter.
- Notices when a site “feels” more trustworthy or well put-together.

NEWS READER
(persona)

DOES

- Scans the homepage quickly, skipping past dense ad blocks.
- Opens the hamburger/mega-menu to jump straight to a section.
- Clicks past broken image placeholders without much thought.
- Occasionally lands on a subscription/paywall page mid-browse.
- Uses search when the menu feels too deep or disorganized.

FEELS

- Frustrated by blank ad slots and pages that shift while loading.
- Annoyed by animated, autoplaying, or flashing advertisements.
- Reassured when a masthead feels credible and well-maintained.
- Satisfied when a story is just one or two clicks away.
- Mildly anxious about “missing the real news” in all the noise.
